Introduction

Frida Kahlo

Frida Kahlo (full name: Magdalena Carmen Frida Kahlo y Calderón) was a Mexican painter born on July 6, 1907, and died on July 13, 1954. She is best known for her many portraits, self-portraits, and paintings inspired by Mexican culture and nature.

She used a folk art style to talk about deep topics like identity, gender, race, class, and Mexico's history. Her art often mixed real-life events with fantasy and showed her personal struggles, including her chronic pain from health problems.

Frida was part of the Mexicayotl movement, which aimed to celebrate Mexican identity. Some people also see her as a surrealist or magical realist artist.

Two of her Most Famous Painting

The Two Fridas (Las dos Fridas) – 1939

Shows two versions of Frida sitting side by side, holding hands. One is dressed in European clothes, the other in traditional Mexican dress. It shows her split identity and emotional pain after her divorce.

The Broken Column – 1944

A self-portrait showing Frida's body split open with a broken column inside, representing her spine. It shows her physical and emotional pain from her lifelong health problems.

The Two Fridas

The Two Fridas (Las dos Fridas) is an oil painting by Mexican artist Frida Kahlo. It was her first large painting and is one of her most famous works.

The artwork shows two versions of Frida sitting side by side:

One wears a white European-style Victorian dress.

The other wears a traditional Mexican (Tehuana) dress.

This painting is displayed at the Museo de Arte Moderno in Mexico City.

Kahlo as a martyr

One can draw a parallel from Kahlo's portrayal of herself to that of the "Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian. In Sebastian's legend, he was discovered to be a Christian and tied to a tree and used as an archery target. Despite being left for dead he survives, only to later perish for his religion by the hands of the Imperial Roman. He is often portrayed tied to a tree, body littered with arrows.
